FROM C-SHARP TO LOVE

IT really started the day Pa Keller sold five acres of his south field. He looked at the check and then spoke to his wife whom he always consulted in any matter, big or small.

"Ma, I think we ought to do something for Bess's girl. She will be nineteen next month. She always wanted a piano. And now she has gone to the city to study music. Suppose we give her a Spinet piano for a present. It would just fit into her apartment."

It was three o'clock on a Saturday afternoon and Helen Lyall was slumped in an easy chair in her living room. She spoke her thoughts to her room-mate, Ida Colin, who shared that two-room and kitchenette affair a renting agent let them have.

"Working all day and trying to take extension courses in music at the University isn't as easy as I thought. If I want that job as a music teacher in Haines Falls I must complete those extra courses by the end of the year. My uncle and aunt have their heart set on my being a teacher."

Ida was about to answer when the doorbell rang. She looked through the peephole and saw two rough looking men.

"Could be hold-up men," she whispered to her chum. "But we probably could talk them into a loan. One says he has a package for you."

It was a rather large package and when the piano was brought into the room Helen's eyes almost popped out of her head. Just what she needed. A piano.

"But are you sure it is for me?" she protested weakly. "I haven't ordered one."

"There's a greeting card with it somewhere," replied one of the moving men. "I know what's inside the envelope because I read it. Kind of cute. Says it's a present from your uncle and aunt. Mr. and Mrs. Linrod Keller from Haines Falls. So you're just nineteen? Too bad I got a missus and five kids. Could fall for you myself."

Helen Lyall lived in apartment 3-C. And apartment 4-C was occupied by Burt Hamilton who worked as an accountant for Riley, Cooper & Horowitz. Just now he was trying to find the missing dollar in a balance sheet. But he couldn't find it because from below was coming strange sounds on a piano. It didn't sound like a radio. After thirty minutes of it he banged on the floor. Up came noises on the pipe. So he went downstairs and rang the doorbell.

"I'm the neighbor upstairs. Can I see you for a moment," he pleaded. "It's about your piano."

"Let him in," said Helen to her chum. "I want to give him a piece of my mind. The nerve of that fellow! To bang on the floor while I play piano."

Burt had never seen the two girls who lived in the apartment below. Helen had corn colored hair, two eyes that reminded you of the sky, and a perfect set of teeth. But he had something to remember. The piano!

"Your C-sharp is flat on that piano. If you must bang it then have a heart. Get that piece of junk tuned. And play it when I'm out. You could also take some piano lessons."

"How dare you be so insulting," flared Helen with anger in her eyes. "I'm going to be a music teacher. And I'll play that piano whenever it suits my convenience."

"Your playing could break a lease. Why not be a lease-breaker and make money?" Burt retorted.

That was more than Helen could take. To insult her was one thing but not her playing. So up went her right hand and a second later you could see the red imprint of five fingers on Burt's cheek. He didn't say a word and left the apartment.

"I don't think you should have done that," Ida suggested. "He looks like a nice fellow."

Friday morning as Helen left her apartment she found an elderly man outside her door. He showed his badge and then a legal looking paper.

"I have a warrant for your arrest, Miss Helen Lyall, for assault upon the person of one Burt Hamilton. If you come quietly, the neighbors need not know about it."

An hour later Helen, with both eyes filled with tears, stood before Judge Charles Scully. She listened to what he said and then replied.

"Of course I hit him. He insulted my "musicianship."

"Since you admit your guilt, I shall have to pronounce sentence. This is serious. Can mean a year in jail."

More tears and almost buckets of them. But the judge was not impressed. Finally he had what looked like a good idea.

"I can suspend sentence and place you on probation with a respected citizen of this community. Do you wish me to do this?"

"Please do," pleaded Helen. "I'll do anything you say."

Then to her surprise, Burt Hamilton walked up to the judge and the two talked together in a low tone for a few minutes.

"I place you in the custody of Burt Hamilton," said His Honor. "And I know you are in good hands."

Helen walked out of the court next to Burt. Then she spoke to him bitterly.

"Mr. Hamilton this is a fine revenge to take. What must I do to atone for that slap?"

"First, call me Burt. And tomorrow moning at eight I'll call for you and we'll go for a picnic to Roger's Park—rain or shine. If you want to prepare a bite, fine with me."

It was a glorious day and the sun cooperated one hundred percent. Just now Helen was happy as she and Burt finished the last bit of food. Roger's Park was an ideal spot.

"I still think I'm dreaming," she said, "but since I prepared this food I must be alive. You really are a nice fellow."

"And you are a wonderful girl. Which reminds me. Tomorrow we go to an outdoor concert. I thought you would like to hear some good music."

Helen didn't sleep that night. She tossed from one side of the bed to the other. This was certainly a funny way to meet a fellow. Sunday came and it was another perfect day. They dined out at a small Italian restaurant. When Burt brought Helen home he hesitated for a moment then took her in his arms and kissed her. All was quiet for some time and then she looked at him.

"Mr. Hamilton," she said with mock seriousness," Do you realize that was, technically, an assault?"

Burt laughed and kissed her again and he had the perfect answer.

"You returned my assault with your kiss. Helen, I love you!"

Helen found she couldn't work much the rest of the week. Burt called for her every evening. Five times at the house and twice for her at the University. Ida thought it time to take things in hand.

"You want to be a teacher," she reminded her chum. "If you fall this way for that fellow you'll be struggling the rest of your life on a budget you'll never meet."

"I think Haines Falls will do without me as a teacher," she announced. "Maybe tomorrow I'll have some wonderful news for you."

The next evening Ida retreated tactfully to the bedroom. Burt came in, kissed Helen and then took a little box from his pocket. He slipped the large engagement ring on her finger and then said.

"You set the date and you can invite all of Haines Falls to the wedding."

"But what about my sentence and parole?" demanded Helen.

There was a sheepish look on Burt's face. He had something to confess.

"The Judge happens to be my uncle. No charge was ever entered on the records. The moment you slapped me I made up my mind you were the girl for me."

A sly grin appeared on Helen's face. She had something to confess.

"I saw you several times and made up my mind you were the man for me. Ida is getting married and hinted she would like this apartment. How to meet you? I played that piano with the loud pedal. From C-sharp to love."
